In this week's Guardian, Kevin Rawlinson visited Thailand, where he found more evidence that building a strong worker's movement is absolutely essential to countering the domestic and global exploitation of labor. There is no better commentary on this than the op-ed by a Thai union official, who warns that: Like it or not, whether you like the boss's decisions or not, whether you like the boss personally or not, you will have to do what you are told. And if you don't like what you are asked to do, go and work in a different company or go back to school to become a teacher. The very last sentence is, of course, in every respect a moral challenge, as well as one which strikes at the heart of neoliberal hegemony. To paraphrase Marx, once the working class has realized that it can't get any cooperation from the boss, it will, to a degree at least, be on its own, which is what it needs to be in order to take society into a new direction, a direction where the bosses no longer own the means of production, and society is not dominated by the maximization of capital. In the face of the enormous challenges Thailand faces — let alone worldwide — it's important to remember that it's still possible for the working class to beat back its relentless enemies. Not because any of those enemies have disappeared, but because, despite the assaults of the bosses' police forces, there are millions of people who still want to fight back. The movement in Thailand is still growing. It also helps that many of its enemies' people are immigrants, immigrants from countries like India and Pakistan, who have a very different perspective on the world from that of native Thais. After all, when people from a different culture and language tell you that they have to "go to the company factory to be treated like human beings," they mean that when they go, they take with them the entire world that they were brought up in. They know very well what they are saying, and are saying it to the employers in Bangkok, who are still sleeping with their wives. In the end, all that's going to be needed is the active support of the masses of workers in Bangkok and in the countryside, and all of the bosses' on-line and off-line resources will be cut off. In other words, the workers will have to be
