Although the new regulation restricting working hours for all salaried workers in Denmark was adopted in 2005, limited research has been performed on the possible health effects from a longer weekly working time. The same applies for the potential socioeconomic consequences of such a regulation. The aim was to conduct a register-based study to elucidate the possible association between the new hourly working time regulations and long-term sickness absence. Register-based study. Data from the Danish Register of Cause of Death and the Danish Register of Sickness Absence were linked to calculate cause-specific length of sickness absence. The study population included all 44,100 male and female salaried workers who had their first period of sickness absence on 1 January 2004. The association between hourly working time and the risk of long-term sickness absence was analysed by using Cox regression with adjustments for occupational group, native country, age and unemployment. Compared with the workers in the long working time category (10 or more hours per week), the hazard ratios for the shortest working time category were 0.88 (p=0.09) in women and 0.97 (p=0.31) in men. The risk of sickness absence was increased for women with non-school ages in the intermediate working time category, but the association was non-significant in the fully adjusted model. There was no association between working time and long-term sickness absence in men and no differences in risk of sickness absence between the lowest and
